The War Declared.

The refusal of the Lincoln Government to receive our Commissioners, followed by its official notification of the Confederate authorities at Charleston that it intends to provision Fort Sumter by force if necessary, is an emphatic declaration of war, which will justify our Administration in immediately demanding the surrender of that fortress. And altho' we may have no positive information justifying the opinion, yet judging from the unusual activity in the War Department yesterday, and the signs from abroad, apparent to the reader, the indications are clear to our mind that if Fort Sumter is not surrendered to-day, it will at once be reduced by the batteries of GEN. BEAUREGARD. When the Government is informed to its teeth that the Fort is to be reinforced, it will not wait to give the enemy the chances of getting within the walls, but will take possession of the stronghold and drive the invader back on the first approach. This is our opinion. A day or two will test the truth of the prediction.
