PROSPECTUS.

WE will issue in this city (Alchemist) on SATURDAY AFTERNOON, September 6th, the first number of the

SOUTHERN ILLUSTRATED NEWS,

A Weekly Journal, devoted to the dissemination of useful knowledge, embracing—

LITERARY NOVELTIES,
HISTORICAL LEGENDS,
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES,
THE LATEST CURRENT NEWS

and, indeed, every subject within the range of polite literature.

Having secured the valuable services of that excellent Artist, Mr. TURCH, late of the "Maryland Line," who will be assisted by the artistic pencil of Mr. KING, long connected with the Mobile Gallery, we will be enabled each week to present to the public a HANDSOMELY ARRANGED LITERARY JOURNAL. The first number will contain an accurate portrait of which will be accompanied with an interesting biographical sketch of the hero.

We have also consummated an arrangement with many writers of acknowledged ability, who will enable us to put forth a paper in no respect inferior to those Northern and English periodicals with which the South has heretofore been flooded. Trusting that our enterprise may receive the liberal support of the reading public, we promise that nothing shall be left undone upon our part to render the paper in its literary character, its Engraving and its Typography, acceptable to all; and whilst catering to the general taste, we shall not omit to set aside a due proportion of space for the special amusement of the Ladies of the "Fanny South," in the sunshine of whose favor we hope to make the "ILLUSTRATED NEWS" a flourishing and favorite journal.

ADVERTISER AND REGISTER

MOBILE:

THURSDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 2.

☞ Our copious army correspondence again crowds our space to the exclusion of other matter of interest prepared for this issue. Our Maryland correspondence gives us the first full and authentic intelligence of the great and exciting events recently transacted in Maryland—culminating in the capture of Harper's Ferry, the grand conflict at Sharpsburg, and the affair at Shepherdstown—which has yet been published. Let no one fail to read his graphic letters.

Gen. J. H. Forney.—The report of the transfer of Gen. Forney from this post, though based upon a substantial fact, we are happy to learn is incorrect, and he still remains in command at Mobile.

☞ Our correspondent, "W. C. E.," having abundant leisure, and being ready with the pen, pitchfork, returns to the charge against our Columbus cotemporary. In his anger at the "ribaldry" and "contemptible tirade" of the Georgia editor, he is betrayed into expletives quite as harsh as the unhappy victim of his ire visited upon the Confederate Senators, for whom his sympathies are so strongly enlisted. When such experienced, politic and prudent men as he can thus inadvertently violate the rules of good taste in a brief article prepared at leisure in his office, it ought, one would think, to make them more charitable towards an editor who has, for the most part, to do his work currente calamo, without time to study the graces of style in the charms of rhetoric.

We have not the leisure, nor at present the requisite space, to continue the discussion with our correspondent, or to notice his rejoinders, except in very brief terms. He agrees with our doctrine that Senators, like other public men, are subject to criticism and censure as well as laudation, and only insists that they be treated like gentlemen, to which we cordially assent. In this we have no quarrel with him. He charges that the article of the Columbus editor "damns with deliberate slander a majority" of the Confederate Senate. Now we do not undertake to defend our arraigned cotemporary. We have not the means of judging fairly in the premises. It is not true, however, that the majority of the Senate are thus badly treated—the editor only impales a part of that majority. Whether the Senators he denounces are slandered or not depends upon the truthfulness of his statements. We know the old English maxim was, "The greater the truth the greater the libel," but in the more liberal pratice of modern counsels, the truth is allowed to be given in evidence.

The parties implicated can certainly cause the matter to be tested in a prompt and efficacious manner if they so choose.

We have only one remark to make in addition. We have never thought or intimated that the members of the Press should be exempted from military service, as any mark of privilege or favor. For ourselves we would not accept exemption on any such terms; sooner would we close the doors of our establishment. If it is not to the benefit of the great cause to keep up the public Press, let it die to day—the sooner the better. It is only in behalf of that cause and the good that we know the newspaper has accomplished—in behalf of the people whose light and bulwark it is, and who never more needed its vigilant eye and powerful utterance than in times of revolution—that we have spoken at all on the subject. But we do contend that if the Press is to be continued at all, that it be without such mutilation as the Senate bill proposed, which would deprive it of all power for public benefit and soon cause it to become a nuisance instead of a blessing to the people.—The true rule for exemption is: Send every man to the field who can do the cause more service there—keep all at home who can serve the country better there; and this is all we ask or the public require of Congress and the Government.

The News.

We are experiencing a lull in military affairs just now, like that which usually precedes and follows a storm, but matters are not in an attitude to permit it to last long. Bragg and Kirby Smith, having taken the initiative in Kentucky, will hardly return to a defensive policy without a decisive battle, at least not until that State is entirely cleared of the Yankee invaders; and they probably will not find it wise to give the enemy much time to prepare for the defence of Louisville. That half-abolitionized city should be wrested from the Federals, even if the shock of conflict should leave it but a heap of ruins. We must have no more hot-beds of anti slavery fanaticism on Southern soil when this war is over.

Our army of the Potomac, which is now, we believe, all on the south side of that river, is resting from its recent tremendous exertions—"like some tanned reaper in his hour of ease." Notwithstanding much straggling and desertion, always incident to long and rapid marches and severe fighting, it is recuperating rapidly, and is reported to be already in condition to take the field again. Our generals are not of the sort to remain long idle.

The yellow fever continues to rage in Washington, and nurses and physicians are going to the relief of the suffering population. Gen. Beauregard has sent Dr. Choppin, of his staff, a physician of great ability and long experience in the treatment of yellow fever in New Orleans.

Yankee correspondents are boasting with characteristic mendacity about a "Louisiana regiment" that has been organized in New Orleans, Col. Holcomb, who commands it, is from Connecticut, and Fisk, the Major, is from Maine—but it will pass with the gullible Yankees as an exponent of Louisiana "Unionism."

An engineer has been sent by the Confederate Government to make a reconnoissance of the Chattahoochee river, for the purpose of locating obstructions and batteries. Our navigable rivers should be put in a condition of complete defence without delay.

General Pope telegraphs from the West that the Indians are more formidable than he anticipated, and asks for authority to have two regiments of volunteers mounted to pursue the Indian war parties.

Kossuth has published a letter denouncing the call of Garibaldi on Hungary to rise, and repudiating the use of his name in connection with the call.

Major Atwood, of New York, one of ninety-seven of Pope's officers, who were paroled and left Richmond on Wednesday for Varina, en route for Yankee land, was brought back on a charge of larceny, and is detained in prison in Richmond.

Before his capture, while out on a thieving expedition, he entered the house of Mr. Lewis Washington, between Harper's Ferry and Winchester, and carried off a highly prized portrait of Washington, giving the overseer a receipt for it. After he had been released on parole and was on his way homeward, he was arrested and brought back, on complaint of Mr. Washington to the Secretary of War, and will now be exchanged for Washington's picture or atone for his crime in the Penitentiary.

[For the Register and Advertiser.]

The "Press" and the Confederate Senate—again.

Messrs. Editors: I have carefully read your long commentary on my short communication, both of which you publish to day. And I must confess to some regret that you had not at once admitted that your "news Editor," in copying the article from the Columbus Sun, had been guilty of violating your views, editorial, in reperusing and circulating a foul and contemptible tirade against the Senate of the Confederate States. You do say, it is true, that you "might even question the propriety and taste of a portion of that article." Now I would like to know of what part of the article you do not question the propriety and taste! It reeks with foul ribaldry! And you, gentlemen, will certainly attribute whatever success you may enjoy in your vocation, as a source as opposite as the poles from that indicated in the article you have copied and gave vent, circulation to. You say you did not endorse the article. True, you did not by any editorial comment, but you will please tell me what difference there is between the endorser of a false bill and the man who puts it in circulation? You admit that "we have in the Confederate Senate men of a high order of talents and irreproachable character." Yet, your "news Editor" has republished an article, which damns with elaborate slander, a large majority of that body.

You say that you dissent totally "from the doctrine promulgated by your correspondent, that there is any particular dignity hedging in Confederate Senators, that makes it sinful or presumptuous in editors or any other class of men to criticise their official acts or to hold them amenable to the bar of that public whence they derive their authority, &c." My communication contained no such doctrine even by implication. I say hold them responsible, but treat them like gentlemen.

You say that there is a "question made between the Senate and the Press." I do not admit that there is any such question. There is no more a question between the Senate and the Press than there is between that body and any other class of people claiming exemption from military service; and the people of the Press have no more rights in regard to exemption than any other people. As high a ground as I would willingly yield to the "Press," I would hold the people composing it, from editors down to printers' devils, to be subject to the law like other men.—If they get any immunity from public service, it shall be from public necessity and for no other reason. And I am sure that one of the best modes of convincing the people of these States that the Press is entitled to little favor, is the printing and circulating such articles as that you have published from the Georgia paper. Only write, Messrs. Editors, in the spirit of that article for a few weeks, and you will find your hitherto justly valued paper will make fewer demands on the teeming presses now groaning under the daily calls for the "Register and Advertiser" and its adjunct, the "News." Our Army Correspondence.

LETTER FROM VIRGINIA.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

SMITHFIELD, VA., Sept. 19, 1862.

The Confederate army has returned to Virginia. Whether General Lee took this step from a military necessity, or for some strategic purpose, or because he had accomplished the object of movement into Maryland—the capture of Harper's Ferry—I am unable to say. The order was issued late last evening, and by the time it was quite dark, the wagons, artillery and troops began to move. All the wounded that were in a condition to be moved, had been taken across the river.—Those whose wounds were very severe or mortal, unfortunately, had to be left behind, and fell into the hands of the enemy. Some of the wounded had never been removed from the field, having fallen on a part of the ground still held by the enemy. Many of the dead were buried yesterday, and some were transferred to this bank of the river.

It was not quite three miles to the Potomac, and our wagon trains extended from Sharpsburg over to the Virginia side. There were only two ways by which we could proceed, one of which was taken by the troops, and the other by the artillery and wagons. Our line came up within a short distance of the enemy's, yet so silently and adroitly was the movement conducted, that McClellan was not aware of it until next morning. It had rained in the afternoon, and the roads were muddy below, while the heavens were covered with a light fog above; both of which facilitated the enterprise.

We had crossed into Maryland by the bright and early morning sun. We returned in silence and at the dead hour of night. The columns [illegible] their way over the hills and along the valleys, like some huge, indistinct monster. The trees and overhanging cliffs, and the majestic Blue Ridge loomed up in dim but enlarged and fantastic proportions, and made one feel as if he were in some strange and wierd land of grotesque forms, visited only in the hour of dreams.

What ever was the motive to the movement, it must be regarded as one of the most successful and extraordinary exploits in the history of any country, and stamps the man that ordered and executed it as one of the greatest military leaders in our time and generation. With the exception of the wounded and a few wagons that got turned over in the darkness, not a man or wagon, nor a single piece of artillery was lost.—Longstreet's corps, being nearest the ford, led the way, followed by D. H. Hill's and Jackson's in the order of their names. The crossing was accomplished by half past six this morning, and soon thereafter the enemy's artillery opened a harmless fire from the opposite heights. The bird had flown, however, and his rage was impotent.

There was formerly a splendid stone bridge at Shepherdstown where the army crossed, but the enemy destroyed it last year. The ford was three-fourths of a mile below the bridge, and this made it necessary to pass down the river bank that distance, and then up it on the other side by a narrow road b'asted out of the rocky precipice. The troops managed to work their way out from the river along some of the gorges that broke through the cliff, and a few wagons and artillery escaped in the same way. Thus you perceive the character of the Virginia side was almost as unfavorable as it could be to the safety of the movement. It is an exceedingly difficult undertaking at any time to transfer an army across a wide stream, but it is especially so under circumstances such as surrounded Gen. Lee.

I am frank to say I was in favor of the movement into Maryland; I am equally ready to admit that, under the circumstances, I now think it was a mistake. This conviction gradually forced itself upon my mind after I came up with the army and saw the miserable condition in which it was. A fifth of the troops are barefooted; half them are in rags, and the whole of them insufficiently supplied with food. Men in this condition cannot be relied on to the same extent as when they are properly clothed and subsisted. The best soldiers, under such circumstances, will straggle, both on the march and in battle. Since we crossed into Maryland, and even before, they frequently had to march all day and far into the night, for three and four days together, without food of any kind, except such apples and green corn as they could obtain along the way. Our supply of food was limited at best, and the base of our operations so distant, the intervening country so barren by reason of the spoliation perpetrated by Pope and his myrmidons, and our transportation so limited, that it was quite impossible to subsist the army as it should be. The difficulty of passing Confederate money in Maryland was another fruitful source of trouble.

The political effect upon Maryland of our retrograde movement must be highly injurious. We shall doubtless lose ground among the people, and it may be we shall have to make up our minds to lose the State itself. It should be the direct necessity, however, that would compel us to abandon Maryland. The waters of the Chesapeake are indispensable to the Confederate States as a naval power, as well as for our security and defence.

Gen. Toombs received a painful, though not serious wound in the hand last night, just as the army was about to move. He was mounted and at the head of his division, with his aids around him, when six or eight mounted men approached slowly along his lines to where his horse was standing. They were asked who they were, and remaining silent, Capt. Troup commenced to draw upon them, whereupon they said: "don't shoot; we are Massachusettsmen." Gen. Toombs was about drawing his pistol from the holsters, when Capt. T. fired upon them. They immediately returned the fire, and then wheeling their horses, disappeared in the darkness. Lieutenant Robert Grant received a slight flesh wound in the arm, also. The men were doubtless lost, and the affair may have contributed somewhat to the deception practised upon McClellan by Gen. Lee, in withdrawing his army across the river.

WINCHESTER, Va., Sept. 20.

I came on to this place for medical treatment, being quite unwell, and to be where there are some mail facilities for getting off letters.

Intelligence has just been received that Jackson engaged a brigade of the enemy last evening at the Shepherdstown ford. Concealing his own forces he permitted the enemy's artillery to get into the river, and many of the troops to reach the Virginia side, when he opened upon them and had another Leesburg affair of it. He killed a large number of them [illegible] a good [illegible] gun report says nothing [illegible] of artillery. These who escaped, gave the devil [illegible] down to Maryland.

There is a report in circulation that we have [illegible] at Williamsport, but it is [illegible] entirely untrue. After Jackson's affair at the ford, he took up his position four miles this side the river. Thus a large number of our wounded, who had been transported to Shepherdstown, have fallen into the hands of the enemy. We hear they have been paroled. The enemy has also thrown forward scouting parties as far as Middleburg, Upperville and Paris on the eastern side of the Blue Ridge.

Nothing further has transpired in regard to the proposition reported to have been made by Gen. Lee to the Federal Government, and alluded to in a former letter of mine. I am credibly informed that such a proposition as that described was certainly made, and under circumstances that encouraged the hope of its acceptance. Recent events, however, may have given a different tone to the affair.

I have just heard of an instance of gallantry in the late battle that deserves to be put upon record. The Floridians always fight well, but the fifth Florida behaved with distinguished courage and intrepidity at Sharpsburg. The hero in this case was a private—Ban Flowers—of that regiment. He was wounded five different times and in as many different places; yet he continued to shoot away as fearlessly as ever, until he received the fifth wound, which disabled one of his hands, so that he could not load his piece. He is doing very well, and as soon as he is well enough, he says he shall be after the Yankees again.

Maj. Phillip Tracy, of the sixth Georgia, wounded in the leg, has since died. He was wounded at Richmond, and only rejoined his regiment the evening before the battle. He had quite recovered his strength, and the amputation to which his limb was necessarily subjected proved fatal. A.

LETTER FROM TUPELO.

The Iuka Movment a Successful Strategetic one—Why it was Made—History of the Movement—Shameful Injustice to Major General Sterling Price—The People's Attention Called to it.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

TUPELO, Sept. 29, 1862.

There are many inquiries as to the object and result of General Price's late march to and retreat from Iuka, and a great desire to know whether it resulted in any advantage, or proved a failure or reverse. The palpable evidence of his having been obliged to retire from his position at Iuka is accepted by some as a proof that he was unsuccessful. Nothing could be further from the fact. Early in August, so soon as General Hardee had moved his forces and placed the railroad at Gen. Price's disposal, the latter made preparations for an advance, and communicated with Maj Gen. Earl Van Dorn, stating his intentions and desiring co-operation, assuring him that so soon as the armies formed a junction he would cheerfully turn over the command to him. The proposition was favorably accepted, but circumstances at the time forbade Gen. Van Dorn's leaving his position, and so he was by a superior and exasperated foe. Meantime Gen. Bragg had accomplished the great task of concentrating his forces at Chattanooga and confronted the enemy with an army that not only stayed their further progress into our land, but threatened their destruction. Soon the Yankees turned their cowering front towards Nashville and were rapidly followed by the Army of Mississippi. Bragg felt confident that he could ruin the fleeing army in his front, but had some misgiving should they be reinforced by the 25 or 30,000 under Grant and Rosencrans, then extended from Columbus and Memphis to Tuscumbia. All the information that he could gain of the enemy tended to their leaving West Tennessee and reinforcing Buell. This he informed Price of, and desired him at any sacrifice to hold the Federal army in West Tennessee in check and prevent their escape, at the same time ordering Van Dorn to act in concert with Price. Price sent an aid to Van Dorn with his plan of operations, desiring his approval and co-operation, and again assuring him that when a junction was formed he would willingly merge the commands and place Van Dorn in the position of Commanding General. This proving acceptable, both parties prepared for the march, Gen. Price gradually advancing his forces by rail and march to Pocahontas, and himself moving his head-quarters to Guntown, where he reviewed a portion of the troops and personally inspected their movements. Up to the day of marching from Baldwin, the 13th, it had not been determined by what route to march upon the enemy, but information having been received that they were at Iuka 8,000 strong, and intended crossing the Tennessee at Eastport, en route for Nashville, the troops were moved forward on the Marietta road and "Natchez trace" to Iuka, which place the cavalry reached on the 18th, finding the enemy entrenched, and awaited the arrival of the infantry, which by a forced march arrived at the place early on the morning of the 14th, only to find that it had been evacuated during the previous night. Possession was taken of the town, and the weary and hungry soldiers fed substantially and luxuriously upon the commissary and sutler stores captured by their valor.

Considerable study was given to the topography of the country, strange to us but familiar to the enemy. The Federals had not attempted a passage of the river at Eastport, but had been withdrawing for some time their forces from Tuscumbia, Decatur and points east, sending them to Corinth, where it was learned nearly all the available forces in West Tennessee were concentrated and reported to be withdrawing to Humburg and Pittsburg Landing, and there crossing the river. Gen. Price sent a courier with this information to Gen. Van Dorn, who had been advancing his forces by the Mississippi Central road, and who was then at Davis' Mill, in the vicinity of Grand Junction, proposing to form the junction at some point on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, or convenient to supplies, and advance in a solid body upon the enemy's force at Corinth. This was acceded to, and the place of rendezvous named, and marching orders were issued on the morning of the 19th to march on the succeeding day.

During the 19th the scouts and pickets came in from various quarters and reported the enemy advancing, laying waste the country in their line of march. About 4 o'clock Hebert's brigade were ordered out to meet the enemy and found them in force within a mile of town on the Corinth or Marietta road. The engagement commenced, the enemy having the advantage of position on a ridge of hills and of masked batteries and concealed forces. Martin's brigade came forward to the aid of Hebert, and the struggle commenced furiously, and the rattle of musketry and roar of artillery ceased not for a moment during the severe engagement of an hour and a half. Gens. Little, Price and staff were upon the field, and the other two brigades of Little's division were ordered forward to the support of Hebert and Martin. The brave commander of the division had but given the command when a death-speeding Minie ball pierced his brain, and reeling he fell from his horse at the side of Gen. Price, with whom he was conversing at the last recorded moment of his fatal hour. It would be doing injustice to one of our most skilful, patriotic and brave officers to omit the encomium Gen. Price, in his official report, passed upon him.

"It will thus be seen that our success was obtained at the sacrifice of many a brave officer and patriotic soldier, chief among whom was Brig. Gen. Henry Little, commanding the first division of this army. Than this brave Marylander no one could have fallen more dear to me, or whose memory should be more fondly cherished by his countrymen than him. No more skillful officer or more devoted patriot has drawn his sword in this war of independence. He died on the day of his greatest usefulness, lamented by his friends, by the Brigade of his love, by the Division which he so nobly commanded, and by the army of the West, of which he has from the beginning been one of the chief ornaments."

But two brigades, Hebert's and Martin's, of this brave man's command, were in the engagement, the others arriving at night fall. The forces of the enemy under the personal command of Rosencrans, encountered and driven back, numbered 8,000. Their loss could not have been heavier than our own; that of Hebert's brigade, composed of those veterans of Oak Hill and Elkhorn, the 51 Louisiana, 3d Texas and Whitfield's Texas Legion, and the 14th and 7th Arkansas, whose reckless bravery, says Gen. Hebert, set at defiance the base doubts which some entertained of their courage, and the 40th Mississippi, which proved their proud right to couple their arms with veterans of Louisiana and Texas—the loss of this brigade in the hour's struggle was 68 killed outright and 290 wounded among whom were the commanding regimental officers of several of the regiments. Martin's Brigade, composed of the 35th, 37th and 38th Mississippi and 37th Alabama, supported Hebert, and to the 27th Alabama and 36th Mississippi, (which I regret to say I mentioned in connection with the 37th and 38th in a former letter) Gen. Price accords great praise, they standing the fire of the enemy [illegible] while some [illegible] Gen. Martin's brigade [illegible] fame brighter [illegible]

The Yankee Guests.—Most of our readers will recollect the riddle of 1813, to which this name was applied. We have encountered something very much like it, if not, as we believe, the identical thing, within a few days past. It is a hazardous conjecture, and easily got rid of by a proper exhibition of stimulants—that, we think, is the popular remedy—but it is awful mean while it lasts. We hardly know whether to reckon it pre-eminence in the way of making one "feel bad," to the gripes or to the near relative the break-bone fever.

Pomegranates.—We see some mention of this fruit for sale in town, recently, we are told, from Blout. Why the abominable prejudice which so unjustly visits the name of the pomegranate should be cultivated where such as these can be produced we do not know.
